Whether you're cycling or walking, you're bound to meet someone else on these routes. Be sensible when you're using Edinburgh's off-road paths...

Look out for others
Look out for yourself!

The route opens out by some new houses and continues to Edinburgh Road. However, turn right into the woodland. Once through the gate you will find yourself in the grounds of Newhailes House. This jewel is now owned by the National Trust for Scotland (0131 653 5599 for opening details as they depend on time of year). Booking is advised at peak times. The grounds are open all year round and contain a variety of interesting structures, including a shell grotto. There are picnic tables here, and the visitor centre has a cafe. NTS requests that cyclists dismount in the grounds.

After seeing the house you could retrace your steps or complete a circular route back to Brunstane Station. You could go even through the former mining village of Newcraighall to Newcraighall Station to catch a train to Waverley, or as far as Dunblane!

There are many other possibilities for an extended day out on this route. Explore Portobello, full of clues to its industrial and holiday resort past, including two bottle shaped kilns behind The Promenade. Walk or cycle as far as Fisherrow Harbour and on into Musselburgh. Or maybe follow the River Esk, detouring to Inveresk Village for a stroll round the secluded Inveresk Lodge Garden, before heading back to Musselburgh or Newcraighall Railway Stations.

The outstanding Newhailes House retains the feel of a lived in home that spans the ages (top)

East Edinburgh

East Edinburgh

It is possible to walk or cycle from Edinburgh's Old Town to Musselburgh, in East Lothian, on paths and quiet roads. The opening of the CrossRail line means you could even cover some of your journey by rail. Bikes are carried free on all ScotRail trains. No booking is required on any service in the Edinburgh area.

The northern end of the route along the Innocent Railway Path begins at Holyrood Road and passes through Dumbiedykes and steeply on to St. Leonard's along Edinburgh's first segregated walk and cycle path. Other 'feeder' routes come from Marchmont and the Meadows area.

The route passes the Engine Shed. This fine building contains a bakery and a pleasant cafe where you could meet and plan your journey. Next comes The Tunnel. It's over 170 years old and was on one of the earliest railway lines in Scotland - the Edinburgh and Dalkeith. It was nicknamed "The Innocent" because it's trains were horse drawn. Steam engines, at that time, were quite dangerous.

The path passes Duddingston Loch, which is hidden behind trees. After crossing the Braid Burn on a bridge which uses the original 19th century cast iron beams, the path stops for the busy Duddingston Road West. Take care here. Then continue on the other side of the road between the South Suburban railway line and Duddingston Golf Course to Bingham. You'll see a different burn at Jewel Park -the Brunstane Burn.

The path here takes you through the Brunstane Burn Community Woodland, then along a narrow path where you can view what must be the only thatched house in Edinburgh with its own landscaped golf course!
